Nitrite Poisoning in Cattle

The most recent loss of cattle due to nitrite poisoning reported in Alberta is from the Delia area where a herd of beef cattle were lost this morning, according to Dr. J. G. O'Donnell, Alberta's Veterinary Veterinarian. This type of poisoning is not very common but a few cases are reported in Alberta each year.

Dr. Oat has been responsible for the majority of cases of nitrite poisoning in Alberta. The "oil hay" poisoning is a term commonly used. The responsible factor in the hay is the nitrate in the alfalfa. The quantity of nitrate in the feed is related to the concentration of nitrate in the soil. Thus heavily fertilized or manured land may be a factor. One case occurred in Alberta where hay was taken from a field, a small part of which had been a sheep corral for years. It was assumed that the oil straw from this particular area carried the high nitrate content.

In the Medicine Hat area nitrite poisoning has taken animals on one farm for three years in a row. The source of the poisoning was traced the first year in a shallow well here contaminated by a leak from a gas line. Negligence on the part of this farmer cost him three head of beef cattle.

The nitrate from the soil are changed to the poisonous nitrite in the body of the animal. The source of the poisoning was traced the first year in a shallow well here contaminated by a leak from a gas line. Negligence on the part of this farmer cost him three head of beef cattle.
